THE SOUTH-By J. B. Johnson. · Much has been said and written in regard to what ought to be the conduct of the South under the anomolous condition which has resulted from the effects of the late war; and however much personal and individual considerations may bias the judgment of some in reference to what should be its course, there can be no difference in the opinion of men of intelligence and principle, in relation to the fact, that it has a most important duty to perform, ere it can entertain the expectation of a realization of that grandeur, which has ever been the dominant idea of its existence. Self respect proclaims that duty to be a line of conduct which will cause it to live within itself, and to maintain a positive exclusiveness in all that it thinks, feels and does. By such a course, it will attain an aptitude for its object; and evil will come to none, but good to all; for bad associations destroy good intentions, and no one has ever yet been much injured by having as little as possible to do with an unfriendly and disagreeable neighbor. The caste of the South was the fitness with which it deported itself, and its pride was its studied refusal to meddle with the affairs of others. It was frank and hospitable; and so evident were these characteristics, that the world called it chivalrous. It meditated no wrong to its neighbors, and it thought not, until it was overtly manifested, that its neighbors intended evil to it. Its confiding nature was its great defect, and its high toned imaginings perished of too much confidence in those whom it ever trusted as its friends. Its neighbors have said all of slander and detraction they could about it, and visited all the harm that they could us on it, and all that is now left it, is its proud indifferent dignity. The exalted soul gathers strength from unmerited injuries, and increased energy from undeserved outrage. The sting of burning insult, the anguish of wounded honor, and the pain of abused pride, last for generations, and are taught by father to son. What was once but fancy to it, has now become reality. The scenes through which it has passed give sighs to its remembrance, and tear-drops to its thoughts; and it it is dead, as those who revile it, say it is, why do they not allow it to rest quietly in its grave? And if it has been overrun, desolated and killed, why do not those who hate it, believe the evidence of their senses, and let it lie cold and stark in its bloody cerements, and not be continually tearing the dress of the tomb from it, and incessantly presenting its mangled corse to the censorious gaze of an unfeeling world? The foundation principle which actuated is, was the immutable attributes of truth, and it has no apology to offer save that of unsuccessfulness. It proudly claims to have done no wrong; and if it has sorrow, it is not from what it did, but from what its neighbors' conduct rendered possible. It asks nought but justice; and desires no laws mocking the ties of friendship with property, and the bonds of the purchaser, and from what its neighbors' conduct rendered posthose who have so heartlessly abused it. It the property to be kept insured by purchasely courts no vindicator but time, and needs no until payment, in the sum of $6,000. shield but its virtue, no fortification but its exclusiveness, and no light but its experience. It has its destiny in its own hands; and by that self-reliance which puts its trust in the faith of the impartial and ultimate justice of the God of the Universe, it can alone arise from the condition to which its enemies con signed it. Heaven shapes its own way to man; and an unseen influence, with gentle touches, is and an unseen influence, with gentle touches, is stirring the aching chords of its drooping heart, and bidding them give out again the strains that were once the music of its clime, and the admiration of the world. All that is necessary to make the awakening perfect, glorious and immortal is, for it to keep itself quietly inactive to all but its internal welfare; for a dignified demeanor will do more to repulse the advances of its persecutors, than the sword; and when it is approached by terms of further degradation, let its 'communications be, yea, yea, nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these
